Compassion and healthcare have not always gone hand in hand, but many strides have been made to incorporate compassion in medicine. Compassion can come in the form of a healthcare provider delivering care to a patient, or a caregiver offering care to their loved one or friend. From its Latin origin “compati” means “to suffer with” (com - “together” or “with” and pati - “to suffer”).

The first step in compassion is often the feeling of empathy toward those who suffer, which in turn produces the genuine desire to help. This desire to alleviate suffering to enhance welfare is at the heart of healthcare and health—caring. Thus, compassion is the ability to be there for someone who is suffering with the intention of enhancing their welfare.

Research—The latest advances in psychotherapy, such as Acceptance Commitment Therapy and Compassion Focused Therapy, and research testing compassion-based meditation techniques give great priority to compassion in the therapeutic process. A recent analysis of 14 studies revealed compassion, including self-compassion, is a significant predictor of emotional wellbeing and resiliency. In the cancer setting, eight sessions of compassion-based meditation training for breast cancer survivors reduced depression and fatigue and improved functional impairment due to fear of recurrence.

Moreover, compassion is vital in delivering cancer care to patients and their families. Recent research published in JAMA Oncology by Eduardo Bruera, M.D. and his team at MD Anderson demonstrated patients’ trust in their physician is significantly associated with how much compassion the physician showed during their interactions with patients.

Tips to Practice Compassion—Meditation is a mind-body practice that can help you decrease anxiety, improve sleep, relax the body and access a deeper awareness through connecting your mind, body and heart. It can help you self-regulate; therefore, allowing you to remain present, effective and compassionate.

Here is a quick, takeaway technique to allow you practice compassion in your daily life:

Joan Halifax, Ph.D., has done extensive work on compassion in healthcare. She developed the mnemonic G.R.A.C.E. to highlight five key steps in the cultivation of compassion.

- Gather attention, by being focused and balanced.
- Recall intention and motivation.
- Attune to your body and mind.
- Consider what will serve.
- Engage, and conclude. In other words, in order to engage fully in a compassionate interaction, one needs to start by learning how to connect more fully with oneself.

Even the simple act of focusing your intentions while washing your hands can be one practical way to start implementing the G.R.A.C.E. model in your life.

Resources available at MD Anderson—Whether you are a patient, a caregiver, or anyone touched by cancer, MD Anderson Cancer Center has many resources available. Taking part in a support group, meditation, other mind-body class or even a spiritual support group are all ways to enhance compassion and promote self-care. We welcome you to take advantage of these many free classes available through the Integrative Medicine Center (see complete listing on page 3).
